CALIFORNIA IN RELIEF: A HISTORY IN WOOD AND LINO CUT PRINTS

This exhibition explores the history of the relief print, which includes woodcuts, linoleum cuts and wood engravings. And it explores this media in a limited geographic area—Northern California. Within this narrow range is a powerful story of artistic techniques meeting in this mid-point between the three great regions of relief printing—Japan, Mexico and Europe. But the story of the relief print's development doesn't stop there, it continues today, acquiring new influences along the way.

The impact of Japanese color woodcut takes two forms. The indirect influence affected artists such as William S. Rice who took what he saw in Japanese prints and created works that are Western in conception but Japanese in inspiration. The direct influence can be found in Helen Hyde and Bertha Lum, two of the most prominent of the many artists who went to Japan and adopted not only the technique, but also the aesthetic of the Japanese print.

When Diego Rivera completed his first mural in San Francisco in 1930, he became the catalyst of a new direction in Northern California art. Many of the artists that were influenced by Rivera and the leftist politics of the time went on to focus on woodcut prints. A central meeting point for many of these artists was the California Labor School (1942–1957) in San Francisco. The Labor School eventually was shut down during the McCarthy era, and the Graphic Arts Workshop emerged from its ashes. Both incarnations served as a home for many artists, including Emmy Lou Packard, Richard V. Correll and William Wolff, who continued the expressive tradition begun in the 1930s.

Wood engraving was primarily a technique for illustration and reproduction in the 19th century. The technical virtuosity of American wood engravers began to rival the British, but by 1915, wood engraving was being replaced by photographic processes. The distinctive quality of wood engraving, which produces such fine line work and tonal variation, is clearly discernible as a style in itself. In the 1930s, artists such as Leon Gilmour began to reinvent wood engraving as a medium whose purpose was more expressive than illustrative.

Before World War II relief prints could be seen broadly to fall into the three categories of Japanese influence, Labor School and wood engraving. While all continued after the war, there were new forces at work. The growth of the university art department, the rise of abstraction, the development of the print publishing houses and, most recently, the Latino art movement, all had a significant effect on relief printmaking.

The GI Bill sent huge numbers of students to universities and greatly expanded the university system. It would be hard to argue that a singular style emerged out of the university system, but the range of teachers brought in from around the country added a new breadth of approaches. Janet Turner, Sylvia Solochek Walters and Kathryn Metz all came from out of state to run printmaking departments.

Abstraction had a profound influence on Northern California artists, although the number of artists producing abstract relief prints has been fairly limited. The medium, with its hard edges of delineation, could have something to do with this. Such artists tend to ride the line between figurative and abstract, whether Inez Johnston's whimsical figures or Sandy Walker's landscape-inspired abstractions.

The birth of the print publishing houses started in the 1960s. Crown Point Press and others began inviting well known artists who often had no experience in making prints to create a work with master printers. Usually the presses focused on etching, but occasionally woodcuts were produced by artists including William Wiley and Robert Arneson.

Despite the history of relief printing in Mexico, the Chicano art movement of the 1970s was dominated by the screen print. Emmanuel C. Montoya was among the first of the artists associated with this movement fully to embrace relief prints. He began in the early 1980s by reaching back to the graphic quality of some pre-Hispanic clay stamps, then making contact with printmakers associated with the Taller de Grafica Popular in Mexico. In recent years more artists, several of whom emigrated from Mexico, have pursued relief prints. These printmakers have a distinctive style and subject matter that clearly suggests a shared vision. Their work also integrates elements of the Labor School, in their social criticism and expressive power. They are perhaps the newest manifestation of the profound influence of Latino art on Northern California, a new flowering appearing years after Diego Rivera's first visit.

I am a relief print artist myself, and the charting of this history is my way of searching for ancestors. By placing the artists in this exhibition within categories, I hope to uncover deeper connections. But in the end, each artist's work stands by itself outside of the schools and influences I have described.
